Special Access Services

Verizon / MCI Transaction

Special Access services will remain competitive and new price regulation is not necessary

Special access services employ dedicated facilities that run directly between the end user and another carrier's point of presence or between two discrete end user locations. Special access services do not use local exchange switches.

Concerns that this transaction will have anti-competitive effects are misplaced, and should not give rise to the imposition of regulatory conditions on its approval.

The FCC regulates Verizon's special access services. The FCC has found the special access market to be sufficiently competitive, and has allowed pricing flexibility for Verizon and other incumbent local exchange carriers. Further, the Commission has initiated a proceeding to investigate the current state of the special access market. Any concerns about the FCC's rules should be addressed in that proceeding.

Approximately 80 percent of Verizon's high capacity special access services are sold at wholesale to other carriers. The combined company will continue to have a strong business incentive to continue providing wholesale customers with good service.

Facilities overlap between Verizon and MCI is very limited

In the limited areas where there is overlap of Verizon and MCI facilities, there are numerous other competitive providers that will continue to serve these markets after the transaction is complete. In the 39 groupings of contiguous wire-center areas in which Verizon and MCI have overlapping fiber, there are:

More than 90 different fiber suppliers.

Two or more suppliers in addition to Verizon and MCI in 92 percent of the areas.

An average of nearly six competitors per wire center.

In sum, the market is working within the current regulatory regime. There is no need for additional regulation specific to this transaction.
